With more than two decades of experience teaching preschool, elementary and middle school, Lisa Dewey Wells has a profound passion for teaching, learning and life. Whether the classroom, working with teachers and parents in schools, or in her yoga and meditation practice, Lisa's focus has always been on knowing relevant content, individuals and patterns of growth and development. This perspective provides a powerful framework for helping caregivers understand children and in the context of their peers and the world.

Both peers and parents note Lisa's ability to communicate effectively on philosophy, practice and observable behaviors, as well as her wealth of knowledge, skill, insight and enthusiasm. As a teacher of teachers, Lisa's experience spans a variety of settings and demographics. She works with a sense of compassion and a creativity that brings a refreshing energy that sheds light on common experiences of parenting and childhood, while also making the current research accessible through engaging narratives. Readers of the blog, Wonder of Children report feeling connected and invested in learning more about child development, finding deeper authenticity in their family relationships and value doing what's best for their child now and for the years ahead.

Regular days for Lisa include yoga, reading, running a busy household, noodling on social media, writing and knitting. Lisa enjoys whatever time she can share with own two emerging adults and black lab, as well as time on the Chesapeake or in the mountains with her husband.
